

Real Estate Teams Script

Printable call packet for FLYR reps - quick demo, objection handling, pricing, and follow-up.

Goal: email the 90-second demo + trial access

Keep it conversational

Ask before pitching

Live Call Path

|                |                                                                                                                |
|----------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| 1. Open        | Confirm they do flyers, door knocking, open house follow-up, or neighbourhood prospecting.                     |
| 2. Qualify     | Ask how they track door-to-door prospecting today.                                                             |
| 3. Match Pain  | If manual or untracked, connect the gap to visibility, territory coverage, agent activity, and lead follow-up. |
| 4. Micro-Close | Ask for the best email to send the 90-second demo.                                                             |
| 5. Finish      | Send demo, include trial access, log outcome, and set follow-up.                                               |

Opening

REP: Hey [Name], how are you today?

THEM: Good, how are you?

REP: Great! My name is [Rep Name] with FLYR. We are a door-to-door software built to help real estate teams track, manage, and organize their field prospecting.

Does your team currently hand out flyers or door knock?

Coach: Keep this conversational. The goal is to confirm field prospecting before explaining too much.

If Yes

That is great. FLYR is designed specifically for team leaders who want better visibility into what their agents are doing in the field.

Are you currently tracking your door-to-door prospecting in any way?

If No

Interesting, is there a specific reason why you don't do any doorknocking?

Tracking Path

They track it somehow

THEM: Yes, we track it somehow.

REP: Nice - what does that look like? Like are you using a spreadsheet, notes on your phone, another software, or are you not really tracking it yet?

Coach: Let them describe it. The messier it sounds, the better. Do not judge or rush to pitch.

Spreadsheet, notes, or phone

THEM: Spreadsheet, notes, or phone.

REP: Honestly, you're 90% there. Recognizing the importance of tracking field effort is literally what our company is founded on.

If I could show you a system that automatically tracks advanced field data and creates a weekly report for your team, would you be open to checking it out?

Coach: Validate that they already understand the tracking problem, then ask about seeing the system.

Another software

THEM: Another software.

REP: Which one? And does it have a map view, route history, a knock sequence, and follow-up reminders for each door?

REP: That makes sense. FLYR can sit beside whatever you're using and handle the field layer: mapped territory, door outcomes, agent activity, and follow-up prompts before it becomes an actual lead.

Coach: Position FLYR as the missing field-prospecting layer instead of a replacement.

No tracking yet

REP: Totally fair. A lot of teams are in the same position.

Most teams are putting in effort door knocking or handing out flyers, but they do not really have clear data on what is working, where their agents have been, or which leads need follow-up.

That is exactly why we built FLYR.

It gives team leaders real numbers on field activity, agent performance, territories covered, and leads generated.

If I could show you how your team could track all of that in one place, would that be worth taking a quick look at?

THEM: Yes.

Coach: Make this about their current visibility gap, not a long feature list.

No Door Knocking Objections

Use this page when they say the team does not currently hand out flyers or door knock.

Scared or uncomfortable

THEM: People are scared to answer the door.

REP: You know what, that makes total sense - most agents feel that way at first. But here's what's interesting: the discomfort you feel is the same discomfort every other agent feels. Which means the ones who push through it own the street. Can I ask - is it more the not knowing what to say, or just the idea of showing up unannounced?

If they don't know what to say

That's exactly what FLYR solves. You open the app before you knock and it tells you exactly what to say based on who lives there and where they are in your follow-up sequence. You're never winging it.

If showing up feels weird

The first time always does. But here's the reframe - you're not a stranger selling something. You're the local expert checking in on your neighbourhood. FLYR tracks every visit so by the third knock, you're a familiar face. Familiarity is what converts.

Close

The agents crushing it in their farm right now felt exactly the same way. The difference is they had a system that made the first ten doors manageable. That's what we built.

Tried it and it did not work

THEM: I've tried it, it doesn't work.

REP: I hear that a lot, and I want to dig into it - because there's door knocking, and then there's systematic farm knocking, and they're completely different things. When you tried it, did you have a defined route, a follow-up cadence, and a way to track who you'd already spoken to?

If they knocked randomly

Right - that's the problem. Random door knocking doesn't work. But knocking the same 200 homes every 60 days with a tracked follow-up sequence? That's how you build 30% market share in a neighbourhood. The agents telling you it doesn't work never had a system. The ones quietly listing every month on their street do.

If they had a system

Tell me about it - how long did you run it, how often were you knocking, and what were you saying at the door?

Close

FLYR isn't door knocking software. It's a farm ownership system. The knocking is just the touchpoint. The CRM behind it is what turns a street into a territory.

Too busy with existing clients

THEM: I'm too busy with existing clients.

REP: Totally fair - you're busy, which means your business is working. Here's my question though: how much of your time right now is going toward generating new business versus serving existing clients?

If most time is serving clients

That's the trap most successful agents fall into. Business is great right now - but what happens in 90 days when the current deals close and nothing's coming in behind them? A farm is the fix. And it doesn't take hours. Ten doors, three days a week. FLYR routes you, logs the visit, and tracks follow-ups automatically. We're talking 45 minutes.

If they have no spare time

What if I could show you a way to run a farm in less time than it takes to prospect on the phone? No dialling, no waiting, no voicemails. You walk a route, tap a result, and you're done. Most of our agents fit it in a lunch break.

Close

The goal isn't to add to your plate. It's to replace the most expensive thing you're already doing - chasing cold leads - with something that builds compounding value every single week.

More Objection Handling

Repeat and referral

THEM: I work off repeat and referral.

REP: That's honestly the best position to be in - it means people trust you enough to send business your way. Can I ask, how predictable is that flow month to month? Like, can you forecast your next six months purely from referrals?

If referrals are predictable

That's rare - most agents can't say that. Here's what I'd offer though: a farm doesn't replace your referral engine, it runs alongside it. Imagine adding a neighbourhood that generates two to three listings a year on top of what you're already doing. That's not more work - that's leverage.

If referrals are up and down

That's the thing with referrals - you can't control the timing. A farm fixes that. It's a consistent touchpoint with a defined group of homeowners who start to see you as their agent before they even decide to sell. FLYR makes that manageable without it taking over your week.

Close

You've built something most agents never build. A farm just puts a geographic fence around it so no one can come in and take those relationships from you.

No system or farm area

THEM: I don't have a system or farm area.

REP: Honestly that's the most common starting point - most agents know they should be farming, they just haven't had a reason to sit down and figure out the system. What's stopped you from setting one up before now?

If they don't know where to start

That's exactly what FLYR is built for. You pick a neighbourhood - we help you with that too if you need it - and the app builds your farm automatically. It pulls the address data, maps your route, and gives you a knock sequence. You're not figuring anything out. You just show up and follow the app.

If they haven't gotten around to it

Here's what I find - agents who haven't gotten around to it are usually waiting for the right time. There's never a right time. But there is a first door. And once you've knocked it, the system takes over. What would it take to knock your first ten doors this week?

Close

Not having a farm yet is actually an advantage. You get to pick the right neighbourhood instead of inheriting the wrong one. Let's find you the right street.

Too pushy or salesy

THEM: It feels pushy or salesy.

REP: I get that completely - nobody wants to feel like they're bothering people. But can I share something that might reframe it? The agents who feel pushy at the door are usually going there to sell. The ones who don't feel pushy are going there to be known. Those are two completely different visits.

If they don't want to bother people

You're not bothering them - you're introducing yourself as the person who knows their street better than anyone. No pitch. No close. Just a face, a name, and a reason to remember you. FLYR even gives you conversation starters based on local market data so you're always showing up with something valuable.

If it feels desperate

Here's the reframe: cold calling feels desperate. Showing up in person in a neighbourhood you own feels like authority. The agents with the highest status in any market are the ones whose faces are everywhere in that area. Presence is positioning.

Close

Nobody buys at the door. The door is just the introduction. The sale happens six months later when they remember your face and your name is the first one they call. FLYR tracks every single one of those introductions so you never lose the thread.

Universal Closes

Demo ask

Amazing. What is the best email to send you a quick 90-second video showing how the software works?

Trial access

Perfect. I will email that over now.

I will also include access to a free trial so you can test it out with your team.

If you have any questions after watching it, feel free to reach out anytime.

Still not convinced

REP: Fair enough - I'm not trying to push you into something that's not right.

Can I ask one thing though: is it the idea of farming in general that doesn't sit right, or just doing it with us?

Coach: Split 'not interested in farming' from 'not interested in FLYR specifically.'

If farming is not for them

Totally get it - it's not for everyone, and forcing it usually backfires. Before I leave it there, would you be open to a quick 90-second demo just to see if it's for you? If it doesn't click in 90 seconds, no worries at all.

If they are unsure about FLYR or timing

That's fair, and honestly a smart way to think about it. What would actually need to be true for this to make sense - timing, proof it works, seeing the app first?

Rather than trying to book you into anything now, I can email the short demo video so you can check it out on your own time.

Soft nurture exit

No problem. I will send the resource over and leave it there. No calendar invite, no pressure - just something useful if farming becomes relevant later.

Pricing

Before quoting price

REP: Good question - before I throw a number at you, can I ask what you're currently spending on lead gen or marketing in this farm-sized area? Just so the number means something.

Coach: Never quote price in a vacuum. Anchor it against what they already spend.

If they do not track spend

That's actually common - most agents don't realize how much unattributed spend goes into staying visible. FLYR is a flat monthly cost that replaces a lot of that guesswork with something you can point to: doors knocked, contacts logged, listings sourced from the farm.

If they already spend on lead gen

Then this is probably going to feel cheap by comparison. FLYR starts at $30 USD per user per month, which is about $40 CAD.

If you're already spending on lead gen, the question is really whether this gives you cleaner tracking and better follow-up for less than what you're already paying.

Pricing close

I can email you the pricing breakdown so you can see it next to what you're already spending. No pressure to decide on this call.

Rep Rules And Notes

- Do not explain every feature on the first call.
- Question first, value second.
- Do not argue with objections. Validate, ask one question, then route to the right close.
- The first-call goal is simple: send the demo, include trial access, and set a follow-up.
- Every call needs a clear disposition: demo sent, follow-up booked, callback set, nurture, no fit, or not interested.

Call Notes

|                         |  |
|-------------------------|--|
| Prospect / Team         |  |
| Email                   |  |
| Current tracking system |  |
| Main objection          |  |
| Outcome                 |  |
| Follow-up date          |  |
| Notes                   |  |
|                         |  |
|                         |  |
|                         |  |